Dejan Anastasijevic

Dejan Anastasijevic is senior investigative reporter for the Belgrade-based VREME weekly, and free-lance Balkan correspondent for TIME magazine. He also contributes to a number of local and foreign news media, including "Slobodna Bosna" (Sarajevo), "Koha Ditore" and "Zeri" (Pristina), and "The Guardian" (London). Anastasijevic started his career in B92 Radio, covering the war in Vukovar (1991) and Eastern Bosnia (1992). In September of 1992, he joined the United Press International (UPI) bureau in Belgrade, where he remained until UPI's bankruptcy in 1993. He then joined the VREME staff, where he still works today. Anastasijevic's 1998 reports on atrocities against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo led to criminal charges by Milosevic's regime for "spreading disinformation and aiding terrorists". In April of 1999, during the NATO bombing and Milosevic's crackdown on free media, Anastasijevic fled to Vienna with his family. He worked in TIME's Central and Eastern Europe Bureau until August 2000. He moved back to Belgrade in time to cover Milosevic's downfall and subsequent transfer to the Hague war crimes tribunal. In October 2002, Anastasijevic was the first Serbian journalist to testify against Milosevic in the Hague. His more recent reports mostly deal with security issues and organized crime in Serbia. Apart from purely journalistic work, Anastasijevic has edited "Out of Time" (IWPR London, 2000), an acclaimed book on Serbian opposition. He is a recipient of 2002 Nieman Fellowship for
